English Classes Study Indian Heritage

One of the fundamental responsibilities of education is to transmit the cultural heritage of the society for which it exists. Many ninth grade students were totally unaware of our great cultural heritage from the American Indian. In fact, most students did not know that Appomattox itself is an Indian name. A unit, "The Indian All Around Us", was developed in hopes that students would acquire the knowledge, understanding, and appreciation that we have borrowed liberally from the culture of these early Americans.

Library facilities, filmstrips, viewmasters, tapes, recorders, art supplies, encyclopedias, pamphlets, magazines, and books were provided for student use. During the three week period students engaged in the following activities according to their abilities, needs and interests: preparing a dictionary of Indian words, locating Indian place names on a Virginia map, preparing and presenting reports, debates, preparing brief bibliographies, and becoming familiar with the Readers Guide in the library. The debates were organized and presented under the guidance and direction of Mrs. Joyce Sweet, a drama and speech major. As a culminating activity, each student was provided with an opportunity for creative thinking and problem solving by preparing and presenting a project to the class to show how the culture of the American Indian has been borrowed unknowingly and adopted in our society today.

Each student was evaluated on his performance according to his ability, teacher observation, self analysis, group evaluation of the individual, and pupil teacher conference. It is the belief that the team teaching approach to instruction is more efficient, effective, and interesting for the students; therefore, this approach is being utilized at the eighth and ninth grade levels for English classes.

Miss Brenda Umberger is working with Mrs. Joyce Sweet and Mrs. Estaline McCraw at these instructional levels.
